

GINHOUSE

This great but short-lived band from Newcastle released just this one great album. They had a good reputation as a live act and wrote some strong material on their album, with the continuous track "The House"/"Sun in a Bottle" the highlight alongside a cover version of the Beatles' "And I Love Her". A lost masterpiece from the golden days of British Blues Rock!

More proof the best British bands come from up North, Midlands, and West Country. From Newcastle. This is a very dark and menacing unique album with some beautiful passages thrown in. Ginhouse had a lot to offer and unfortunately may have been too strange for anyone to fully understand them at the time. On the other hand progressive rock was big at the time. Then actually I know prog rock was overlooked most of it.

After all, one of the best hard rock groups from the United Kingdom. This album is not so accessible as usually hard rock groups' are, this one has lot of rhythm breaks and some progressive touches. This album needs little bit more listening but it is not boring at all. If you listen to this once, it's not enough. Sometimes other good records need more listening. When this album has opened you can listen to it for years without any boring. One of the best albums from B&C label.

Line-up: Geoff Sharkey - guitars, vocals; Stewart Burlison - bass, vocals; Dave Whitaker - drums.
